THE GERMAN PRESS AND MILITARY SECRETS

Clause 9 of the bill now before the German reichstag renders any person who publishes a military secret liable to imprisonment or incarceration in a fortress up to three years, or to the payment of a fine not exceeding $1250. The union of all the German press associations and institutions has addressed a petition to the reichstag in which it begs that body to reject that clause. The union points out that as no definition is given of a military secret, the newspapers are at the mercy of the arbitrary decision of any person in authority, and would be quite unable, if the clause became law, to discern whether there were anything of a secret nature in what might appear to be a harmless piece of news.

The union points out further in its petition that if clause 9 becomes law the newspapers will either have to refrain altogether from publishing military news, or editors must always reckon with the possibility of coming into conflict with the judicial authorities. Both possibilities, the petitioners state, would be exceedingly detrimental not only to the press, but also to the army. The petitioners finally venture to express the opinion that the question of safeguarding military secrets should not be judged solely from the standpoint of the necessity of keeping the danger of espionage by foreign powers, and they add that the German newspapers have never given the army authorities cause to doubt their patriotic intentions, and have, moreover, never refused to comply with the clearly expressed wish of the army administration—London Post.
